Title: Digitalis – into the heart of the library

ABSTRACT

A traditional librarian gets heart disease while trying to control the mass of digital informations. Let us show the digitization is helping the library like the 'Digitalis' which is a <Drug that increases the efficiency of the heart by strengthening its muscle contractions and slowing its rate. It is derived from the leaves of the common European woodland plant Digitalis purpurea (foxglove).>

We consider like that the complex digital product of Ex Libris, the DigiTool which according to our expectation and experiences is contributing strongly the gain of the position and attractiveness of the libraries in the world of the abounding digital information overflow. It enables institutions to create, present, manage, preserve, and share locally administered digital collections. We want to present how it works.
